AN INTERLUDE

cannot very well describe the tone in hich Amy pronounced my name, nor can truly describe the look she gave me. I suppose most people would have said that she was angry. If heightened color, curling lip and flashing eyes denote inger, then I must admit that she was; in fact, she said so.

At the same time I must admit that I had never seen her look more charming. "I am very angry," she repeated for

I did not answer. It was a mon then silence seemed more discreet than peach; besides, I had nothing to say. Very angry indeed," she continued ith fresh emphasis.

"Why should you be?" I asked.

She opened her eyes to their fullest exent and simply gasped.

Oh! you are"-then she turned her ad away impatiently, giving me the old shoulder in a very literal sense. It s a very white and rounded shoulder, nd it showed in the dim light of the con-harming girl. A dying leaf dropped airily into my

inp. It brought with it an inspiration. and, picking it up, I gently touched her

"No," I said calmly; it was this leaf. It has just fallen." She frowned and rubbed her shoulder. After all, I spoke the truth; it was the "You don't seem to believe that I am angry." she said. "Oh! ves. I do."

"You knew I should be angry?"

"Then why did you do it?" she asked, severely.

Again I was inspired. We were sitting by a fountain, one of those absurd tricklg affairs in which gold fish swim in circles. It was very still and clear, and called Amy's attention to this. "Look." I said.

"Well?" she said.

"Well, you know why I did it now."

She' beat an impatient tattoo on her knee with her fan. Still, I don't think he was displeased. "You get worse instead of better."

"Nay, I think I get better instead of orse," I retorted, rather wittily, I think. You must admit that It is an advance, "An advance?"

"I have never done it before." "Not with me, but"-"I meant not with you."

But with how many others?" she

"Not more than half a dozen." I anrered. No man would have answered

"I suppose that red-haired thing, Belle nythe, was one?" she murmured. "Oo, Amy!" I cried, tragically. "You duldn't think"-

Well, if I thought you had I should ever have let"-Then she bit her lip and

"No. Go on, tell me their names," "Really, I've forgotten them." "Well, it is impossible to ren

"But I do. Haven't you treated me in mission, I suppose?" "And you didn't ask mine."

'No; you'd have thought me very silly MI had asked."

"Indeed, I shouldn't, and you must understand that I won't be treated like "I haven't treated you like them."

"Pardon me; there was a difference-a great difference." What was it, pray?" There was a pause. I employed it by asking her hand. She tried to withdraw It, but I don't think she wanted to succeed. At any rate, she didn't. "I was going to tell you what it was," I said, "but you wouldn't give me time." "You should have told me before," she replied,

"No. I suppose you couldn't. Well, go too. I can't quite recollect what I said now, but it seemed to please her. Her once-at the part where I said she was the only girl I had ever really love-well, she just squeezed my hand. "You believe me?" I said when I had

"You really mean it?" she asked softly.

For a moment I was at a less. Girls want such a let of convincing in these matters, and I had said all I could say. What could I do? Then I was inspired again, and-well, I did what I had done

"Oh, yes, but-my hair. I'm afraid people will notice," and she put up her

"Well, it doesn't matter if they donow," I said.
